Book Review: 'Only Connect': Belonging and Estrangement in the Poetry of Philip Larkin, R. S. Thomas and Charles Causley by Rory Waterman

Original Citation

This version is available at http://eprints.hud.ac.uk/28971/

The University Repository is a digital collection of the research output of the University, available on Open Access. Copyright and Moral Rights for the items on this site are retained by the individual author and/or other copyright owners. Users may access full items free of charge; copies of full text items generally can be reproduced, displayed or performed and given to third parties in any format or medium for personal research or study, educational or not-for-profit purposes without prior permission or charge, provided:

• The authors, title and full bibliographic details is credited in any copy;
• A hyperlink and/or URL is included for the original metadata page; and
• The content is not changed in any way.

For more information, including our policy and submission procedure, please contact the Repository Team at: E.mailbox@hud.ac.uk.
University of Huddersfield Repository

Underwood, James

Review: 'Only Connect': Belonging and Estrangement in the Poetry of Philip Larkin, R. S. Thomas and Charles Causley by Rory Waterman

Original Citation

This version is available at http://eprints.hud.ac.uk/29927/

The University Repository is a digital collection of the research output of the University, available on Open Access. Copyright and Moral Rights for the items on this site are retained by the individual author and/or other copyright owners. Users may access full items free of charge; copies of full text items generally can be reproduced, displayed or performed and given to third parties in any format or medium for personal research or study, educational or not-for-profit purposes without prior permission or charge, provided:

- The authors, title and full bibliographic details is credited in any copy;
- A hyperlink and/or URL is included for the original metadata page; and
- The content is not changed in any way.

For more information, including our policy and submission procedure, please contact the Repository Team at: E.mailbox@hud.ac.uk.

http://eprints.hud.ac.uk/

Rory Waterman intriguingly combines discussions of Philip Larkin, R. S. Thomas, and Charles Causley, three poets who 'epitomize many of the emotional and societal shifts and mores of their age', in the hope of making possible 'new and persuasive readings'. Focussed conceptually on belonging and estrangement, the book's six chapters explore literary traditions and audience; geographical and cultural origins; relationships, particularly marriage; war; society and isolation; and faith and mortality.

Although such an underpinning does at times lead to somewhat pedestrian analysis, generally, it allows for insightful readings of their work. Waterman is at pains to show how belonging and estrangement are not oppositional and static experiences, but have shades and crossovers, as in the case of the 'man kicked out of his home' and the man 'who has chosen to leave his wife' – both are estranged, but in very different ways. When such thinking is brought to bear on the three poets, it reveals the tensions and ambiguities in their work. This is particularly true of Waterman's succinct and fascinating readings of Thomas's 'Iago Prytherch' works, a loose grouping of poems from across his career. The 'half-witted' Prytherch, a fictionalised peasant representative of the impoverished rural Welsh is often subjected to sneers of condescension – such emotional intensity reflecting back on Thomas, who felt deeply estranged from the communities he was supposed to know and serve as priest. But in 'The Peasant', an early poem, the experience of war shows him to have more in common with Prytherch; both remain at home, rather than engaging in combat, Prytherch preserving 'his stock' against 'sieve of rain and the wind's attrition' – the poem's military language reflecting its composition during the Second World War. Prytherch is described as 'your prototype' – thereby bringing peasant, poet, and reader into a triangle of community and belonging.

The juxtaposition of these poets can be enlightening, particularly on questions of linguistic and geographical belonging: Causley felt no estrangement from his native Cornwall, despite not speaking Cornish; whereas Thomas felt dismayed by his inability to speak Welsh, viewing Causley's Cornwall as a warning to Wales regarding the dilution and Anglicisation of an historic vernacular culture. Perhaps more exploration of the connections between these poets would have been fascinating. We learn from the beginning that Thomas was dismissive of almost all his contemporaries, while Larkin, a fan of Causley, once privately called the Welshman 'Arse Thomas [...] the bible-punching old bastard'. Yet Waterman informs us, at the end of his study, that Thomas admired Larkin's poem 'Faith Healing', while Causley treasured 'The Explosion'. This leaves one to wonder what kind of cross-pollination occurred between the three, though perhaps this would require a different kind of study.

Waterman, himself a poet, is especially strong on poetic forms and techniques. His interrogation of Causley's ballads finds allusions and formal subversions which undermine the common perception that his work is simple. However, Waterman perhaps misses two opportunities. The first is the general issue of who reads poetry. Waterman acknowledges this question, but his study of belonging and estrangement does pose the question of precisely who these poets' work belonged to, or was estranged from. The other question is more specific: Waterman asserts that 'with very rare exceptions his work eschews intertextuality, and shows little or no evidence of outside influence at all in anything but the broadest terms'. Such comments seem strange, given the clear influence of the Blake of Songs of Innocence and Experience, or the Wordsworth and Coleridge of Lyrical Ballads. Despite his own claims, Waterman places Causley's war poems within a broader context of Second World War poetry; yet he misses some fairly obvious connections to Wordsworth's 'Tintern Abbey' in his discussion of theism in Causley's 'At St Hilary'. Given the critical neglect of Causley's work, further excavations might help to stimulate more attention; however, Waterman's inclusion of Causley in this study makes a substantial contribution to our understanding of this particular poet. This is in part due to some extensive archival research in the Causley collections at the Universities of Exeter, and Buffalo, New York – scholarship which has truly benefited the study.

It is pleasing, also, to see extensive research done in the Larkin archives held by the University of Hull. However, Waterman's discussions of Larkin are problematic, particularly when it comes to the poet's relationship with place. Waterman insists on asserting Larkin's English rootedness and patriotism, despite all of the evidence to the contrary (though in his defence, he
The poet and biographer of Thomas Hardy, John Osborne, says that Waterman 'does not exactly winge and whine, but he is a bit of a curmudgeon'. Indeed, Waterman's readings of Larkin are trenchant: he is critical, often unsparing, and without properly incorporating the revisions to Larkin's corpus made by Burnett, some of his readings of Larkin are problematic, however. His discussions of 'An Arundel Tomb' and 'Aubade' are excellent, and truly benefit from his archival research. Reading the former, Waterman corrects Andrew Motion's description of Larkin's qualifying comment in his workbook that 'Love isn't stronger than death just because two statues hold hands for six hundred years'. This statement is not jotted at the end of a full draft (as Motion says), but rather before Larkin writes the final stanza. This is noteworthy, because it changes the relationship between poem and comment: rather than the comment being Larkin's belated critique of the entire poem's potential triteness, it shows the poet deliberately setting up the final stanza as a bleak qualification of its previous stanzas. If we then, as Waterman suggests, read the word 'love' as a pun on 'nil', then there is a case to be made that this famous love poem 'is actually considerably less consoling than 'Aubade'”. Revisionist thinking like this is most welcome, and leaves one wishing there were more.

So although this book would benefit from an engagement with the drastic changes within Larkin scholarship which have been taking place since 2008, it also partly achieves its aim of presenting new readings of these three poets through the juxtaposition of their work. The work on Larkin is less fresh and more problematic, but there is much to celebrate here, not least some incisive readings of Thomas and Causley, some superb archival research, more critical attention for Causley, and the odd flash of astuteness when it comes to Larkin.

Tourist attraction, on the back of which Causley scribbled an early version of his poem, 'At the British War Cemetery, Bayeux'. Initially the poem was to have a narrow focus, on the grave of one unknown British sailor seen in the cemetery. But by making the poem less specific, 'Causley shifts the emphasis to a sense of belonging, of unity, among the war dead of all ranks and occupations'. The specific biographical occasion is only the chrysalis from which a more beautiful entity eventually emerges. Waterman understands that to read the event and the poem in parallel is to miss the point of the poem. In his reading of Larkin's 'An Arundel Tomb', Waterman comments that the effigy is not a truthful representation, but rather 'a symbiosis of art and artifice'. This is a good point, but the same could be said of any work of art, Larkin's poems included. Despite the stated aim of providing 'new and persuasive readings', it will be difficult to say anything substantially new about Larkin from now on without engaging with the work of anti-biographical scholars like Osborne (whose 2008 monograph is fleetingly dismissed as 'protestations') and Steinberg (whose book is cited only in the bibliography), and without properly incorporating the revisions to Larkin's corpus made by Burnett's edition of the Complete Poems.