Social Marketing is essential a ‘behavioural intervention’. This behaviour change strategy draws from a wide variety of theory and practice; to look at the best ways to achieve the desired influence on the specific behaviours of individuals or groups being targeted for their social good and that of society. Historically, social marketing’s roots lie in both:

(a) The social system, which highlights its social context and the awareness of its links to the social sciences;
(b) The commercial marketing system from which it has extracted the system’s technologies and specially moulded and utilised the ‘4Ps’ to the benefit of its interventions.

Social marketing is:
The systematic application of marketing, alongside other concepts and techniques, to achieve specific behavioural goals, for a social good.

In short...social marketing is about "using marketing for the benefit of people".

Aims:
To evaluate the impact and sustainability of relationships and exchanges that have been established between marketers and target audiences, in social marketing campaign activities designed to produce behavioural changes.

Methodology:
A mix method of quantitative and qualitative analysis is applied. A quantitative method is used to evaluate the secondary data of one hundred (100) case studies of different types of social marketing campaigns. Variables are selected, grouped, and then analyzed via SPSS. Four of the above case studies will be singled out for qualitative analysis.

Results / Own Opinions of Research:
Review of the literature and evaluation of the case studies’ secondary data are pointing to the fact that marketers and target audiences interactions, when underpinned by quality working together, ethics and clear benefits to the target audiences, will bring sustainable results. Involvement and a sound relationship encourages ownership of any behavioural change process and gives more meaning to the continuation of any outcome.

On Reflection:
If those who are, and seeming to be in positions of advantage over others and at the same time wanting their co-operation in process outcomes, they will need to operate a system that makes all participants’ contributions valued and equal at all levels.

Contribution to Knowledge / Where Next?
This may be especially salient for statutory services that are embarking upon service-delivery via a social marketing route. For many statutory services this is a change from the norm.

References: